Nuggets in the Scree

At the April 2010 MCA meeting Alex Christie announced that he had recently climbed Mount Billy Mitchell (7217) to its summit. He reportedly started at 2 a.m. and finished at 9 p.m. Mount Billy Mitchell is in the Chugach Mountains east of the Richardson Highway and west of the Copper River. (We look forward to a written trip report.)

Geographic Names Committee Action

The Geographic Names Committee provided comments to the Alaska Office of History and Archaeology regarding a proposal to rename Negrohead Mountain (2809) in the Kevinjik Creek and Rat Creek drainages of the Porcupine Plateau to Tl'oo Khanishyah Mountain.

On the Web

The American Alpine Club reported that in April 2010 Joey McBrayer and Christopher Wright climbed a peak in the Yentna Glacier and Swift Fork of the Kuskokwim River drainages of the Mantoks region of the Alaska Range and named it Mantok II. There have been no other recorded ascents of this 9650-foot peak.

Snider Peak

by Mark Henspeter and John Giraldo

Our goal was Snider Peak. Located within Wrangell-Saint Elias National Park and Preserve near Glennallen, Alaska, this jagged pyramid of rock is strung between the 12,010-foot Mt. Drum, and the 14,163-foot Mount Wrangell. Standing at a mere 8,250 feet, Snider isn't the tallest summit, but it has massive personality. The nearly vertical 3,000-foot northwest face, dominated by serrated spires on all corners, gives this small peak an aggressive stance. Due to this daunting demeanor, nobody climbs it, despite being hardly a 15-minute flight from the Gulkana Airport.

After a shelved attempt in 2009, we returned to Snider in May 2010, prepared with the right tools for the job. Having scoped out the mountain on the ground and from the air, we had our plan of attack. We dubbed the route "Dicktation."

Mark with the Camera, John with the Glasses, and Mount Drum in the Background

That first night it snowed, and a small squall kept temperatures warm enough to prevent the snow from hardening. The next day we kept low and rested, knowing our summit push would start early the next morning. At 1 a.m. we rolled out of the tent, donning gear and downing as many calories as possible. We scuttled up the flanks of the mountain as fast as we dared, treating the still-loaded snow slopes with caution. Sunrise met us on the high west ridge of Snider, where we inched our way toward the direct couloir leading to the summit. The first section was a gentle traverse, leading to a snow climb up a bowl on the northwest section of Snider. These slopes posed some of the most serious avalanche risks of the entire climb. The most efficient route was to gain the top of the bowl at the lowest point, clearing the western ridge of Snider. Past the ridge we dropped onto a large generally flat basin quickly leading us toward the base of the summit.

Once at the base of the summit pyramid, the first real climbing began. At approximately 6,500 feet, there were two couloirs on the southwest face that led up from the massive western basin toward the peak. The southwest couloir was the most direct route to a high saddle at 8,000 feet on the north face, with access to the summit. The southeast couloir dead-ended roughly 400 feet below the summit. The first 400 to 500 feet were reasonably open and exposed, and due to shallow snow conditions, we climbed it unroped. Earlier in the year it would have been easy to use a running belay with snow pickets. After about 500 feet, the couloir narrowed, and began to concentrate into a gun barrel for the next 800 feet. There was some ice present throughout this section; however, during our ascent it was patchy at best. The last 200 feet of the couloir was primarily a snow climb to the north saddle. We took great care in the saddle, as the north side was a massive cornice, overhanging the 3,000-foot northwest face.

Mark Henspeter pauses in the couloir.

The final pitch was where the route got technical ... and the adrenalin began to pump. From there it was a steep mixed-snow-and-rock line up the north face for approximately 200 feet. We encountered primarily sugar snow on a volcanic tuff, a rather featureless medium that forms without many cracks – making protection sparse. The exposure was compounded by the position of the route over the northwest face. Any error here was a one-way ticket over a half-mile down the icy slope below.

The Final Pitch

After an hour and a half we gained the razor-thin pinnacled ridge at the top of our route. The far end of the ridge to the southeast rose to an abrupt (roughly 20-foot) spire, but due to the exposure and depleted rack, we knew this was the end of our route. The toil of the thousands of feet quickly faded, as the view alone was worth the climb. The gnarly southern face of Mount Drum loomed directly to the north, and jagged ridges leading to Mount Wrangell fell away to the east. To the west, the horizon was filled with nothing but the open valley, dotted with lakes and ponds, leading to the Copper River. The Chugach Mountains in the distance formed a stark boundary between valley floor and sky.

As breathtaking as the view was, we couldn't dawdle on the ridge crest. The blazing May sun was rapidly softening the snow and necessitated a speedy exit. One 60-meter rappel brought us back to the safety of the saddle and two more rappels saw us out of the more dangerous pitches. The rest of our descent was quick and refreshing, and we rolled back into camp at 5 p.m.

Recap:

The total time will vary depending upon snow conditions; however, the total time camp to summit could be less than 10 to 11 hours. The most straightforward route was to wind around the mountain, from the northwest to the southwest face. The mountain may also be climbed directly via the northwest face; however, this route would be extremely exposed, lying beneath hanging glaciers near the summit. We ascended via the northwest-to-southwest route in both 2009 and 2010, and this route provided the most stable snow, and was more protected. To our knowledge as of 2010, no other climbers have completed this route.

Peak of the Month: McHugh Peak

By Steve Gruhn

Mountain Range: Western Chugach Mountains; Front Range

Borough: Municipality of Anchorage

Drainages: Little Rabbit Creek and McHugh Creek

Latitude/Longitude: 61° 2' 29" North, 149° 39' 58" West

Elevation: 4311 feet

Prominence: 1161 feet from North Suicide Peak (5065)

Adjacent Peak: North Suicide Peak

Distinctness: 1161 feet from North Suicide Peak

USGS Map: Anchorage (A-8) SE

First Recorded Ascent: 1963 by John Duey Unger

Access Point: Upper Canyon Road

McHugh Peak is the fourth-most prominent peak in the Front Range of the Western Chugach Mountains and is visible on the southeastern skyline from most places in the Anchorage bowl. As such, McHugh Peak provides commanding views from its summit.

Vicky Lytle on the East Ridge, November 2010

The name McHugh Peak was first reported in 1942 by the Army Map Service. The name undoubtedly was derived from the nearby McHugh Creek, the name of which was first reported in 1912 by the U.S. Coast and Geodetic Survey.

Vin Hoeman recorded that John Unger climbed McHugh Peak in 1963, but did not report which of the several possible routes he took. Hoeman's records are housed with the Archives and Special Collections at the UAA Consortium Library.

McHugh Peak, North and South Suicide Peaks, Spring 1992

I first climbed McHugh Peak in the mid-1980s with Doug Hamilton from Canyon Road via Rabbit Lake and the east ridge. At the time, it was possible to drive a two-wheel drive vehicle to a point southwest of Ptarmigan Pass at an elevation of nearly 2,900 feet. That access has since been blocked to motorized vehicles at a point 2-1/2 miles to the northwest and 1,000 feet lower. However, the trail to Rabbit Lake remains accessible and the route is still commonly traveled. The route from Rabbit Lake up the 3-mile-long east ridge is straightforward. Scrambling is only necessary for the last 20 feet of the summit block.

On September 16, 2000, Doug and I returned to climb McHugh Peak from a trailhead off Honey Bear Lane in Bear Valley. Our route took us up the straightforward north ridge.

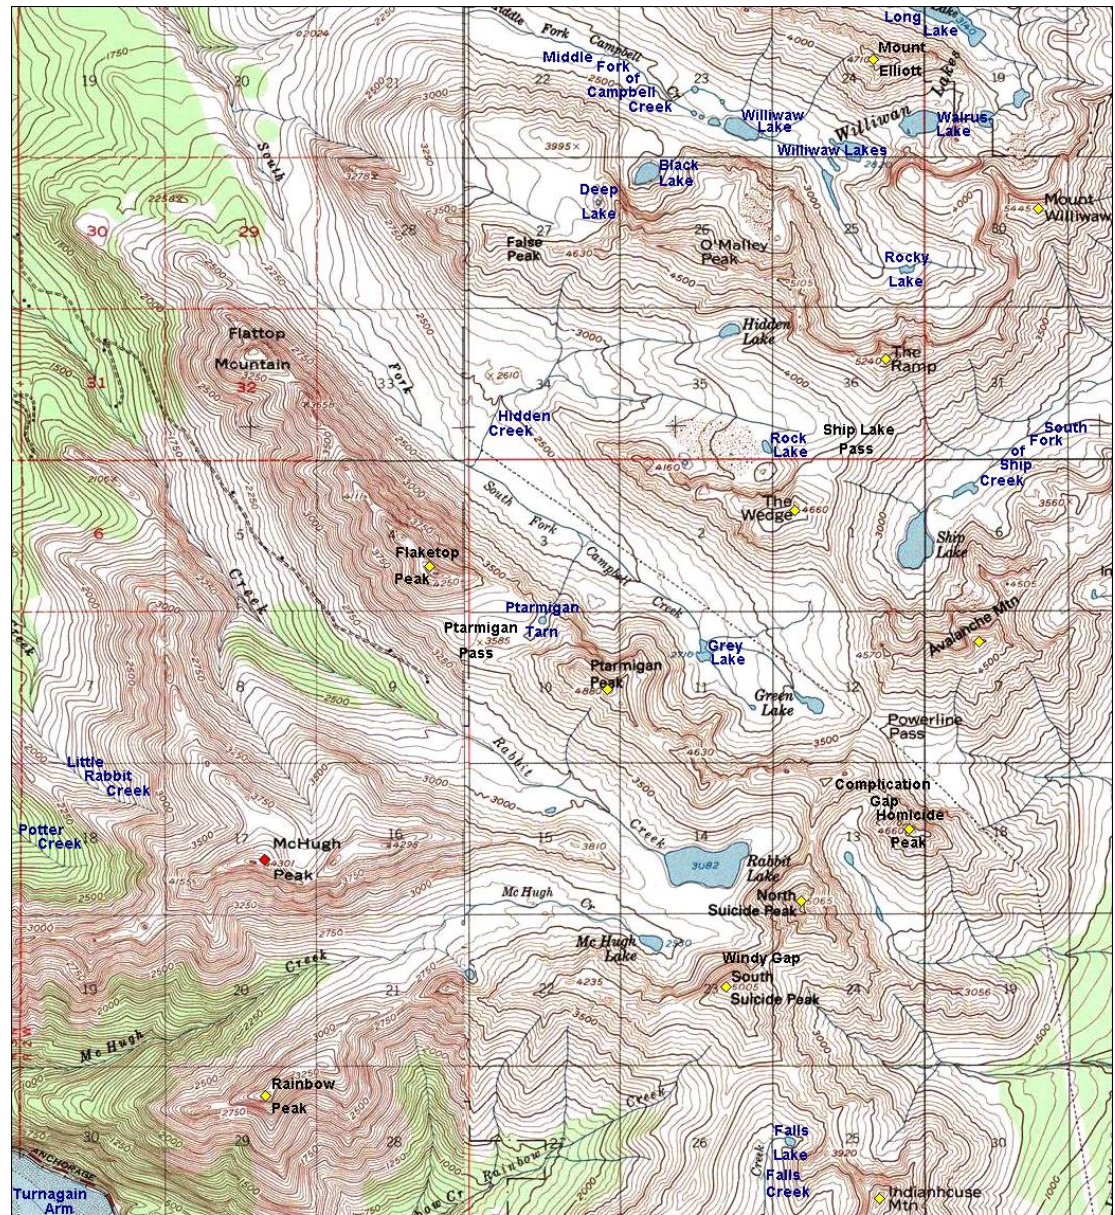

On April 26, 2003, Annette Iverson and I climbed McHugh Peak from the McHugh Creek Trailhead off the Seward Highway. Our route took us first northwest on the Turnagain Arm Trail and then up the McHugh Lake Trail to a brush-free route to the southwest ridge of McHugh Peak. The route involved over 4,200 feet of elevation gain, but was not technical.

On August 16, 2008, while participating in an orienteering race, I returned to the summit of McHugh Peak once again. My route started from a trailhead off Mountainside Village Drive above Potter Creek and attained the north ridge.

Because of its easy access, climbs of McHugh Peak have been documented frequently in past *Scree*s. Sally Hague reported on an August 1, 1965, trip up the northwest ridge in the September 1965 Scree. Lotte Kramer reported on a July 28, 1968, traverse of McHugh Peak from the north ridge to the east ridge in the August 1968 Scree. Larry Swanson reported on a June 22, 1969, trip up the southwest ridge in the July 1969 Scree. Tim Neale reported on a January 3, 1981, winter ascent in the January 1981 Scree. Neil O'Donnell reported on a January 21, 1990, trip up the northeast gully in the February 1990 Scree. The May 1970, January 1981,

June 1985, May 1983, February 1999, June 2002, and June 2005 *Scree*s also have reports of ascents of McHugh Peak.
