TRIP REPORTS

6 Huts on the Eklutna Traverse

by Stu Grenier

Last April Brent Hughes, Norm Knowles and I hit six huts in one week on the traverse. In case you don't know the traverse goes from Eklutna Lake to Girdwood. It seems that in March and April lots of people start talking about doing it so this is probably a suitable time to publish an account.

The six huts that we hit were the new Eklutna Hut (the park service calls it the Serenity Falls Public Use Cabin), Pitchler's Perch, Hans' Hut on the Whiteout Glacier, Rosie's Roost on the Eagle Glacier, The Nordic Ski Camp on the Eagle (it is actually a two story house), and the State Parks cabin at Crow Pass.

We left the Eklutna Lake trailhead about 9AM on a clear April 16th. It was early in the morning with no new snow so the surface of the lake was hard and fast. With 50-pound packs and one sled we crossed the lake in just over three hours. The deep tracks on the lake told of skiers who experienced much warmer temperatures and therefore slower skiing.

After we pulled into the new Eklutna Hut, stoked the stove up, kicked back and took in the awesome view, there came a knock at the door. It was from the team that had left the deep tracks on the lake the day before. They had gone up the East Fork of the Eklutna River and camped and now were heading to Pitchler's Perch like us.

The next morning the six of us left for the Eklutna Glacier. Their younger, lighter packed, and faster team took a route up the left side of the glacier in a pronounced gully. This route worked but prevented them from getting their skis on earlier and was subject to avalanche. We tracked them about 100 yards and then crossed to the center of the glacier where we could change our crampons for skis and stop sweating avalanches.

Farther up the glacier we hit their tracks again and followed them to Pitchler's Perch where they had been watching us for hours as we slowly worked our way up the glacier. Spirits were high that night as it became clear that we had stumbled upon a high pressure system and that these young guys were going to set a trail all the way to Girdwood for us.

The next morning we started our slog for the horizon and Whiteout Pass under a crystal clear sky. Soon the young team zoomed past us as they set their sights on Rosie's Roost on the Eagle Glacier. We were heading for Hans' Hut on the Whiteout. By 3:00 o'clock they were slipping over Whiteout Pass, just tiny dots on a sea of white. It was sad to see them go but the trail that they broke was a God sent. As the day heated up the sled proved to be a mistake. A complete snowplow, it sucked the energy out of anyone who pulled it. Laying on our packs looking straight up into the bluest sky imaginable, flocks of geese heading north in long V formations, honked thousands of feet over our heads.

We got to Hans' Hut a fairly tired lot. I was especially glad to have reached it since 15 years earlier we had skipped it. The rays of the setting sun, a bottle of whisky left by a kind soul, and a very comfortable hut made for complete satisfaction. The next morning we woke to clouds and snow but plenty of visibility to make Rosie's Roost. Being fairly tired we got a late start and barely got to Rosie's Roost before night fall and dark clouds. By now the other team's tracks were gone. In the hut we found a stack of sleds that had been left by others. We gladly left ours, too.

The morning of day five was clear and calm so Norm and I, with light packs, left Brent to enjoy Rosie's as we skied on up to the Nordic Ski Camp on the top of the Eagle Glacier. We were very happy to find a door unlocked but greatly disappointed to find that it only opened in, the entire inside entryway was so full of snow we couldn't open the door any more than an inch. We went under the building to find that unscrupulous people before us had cut holes in the floor to get in. Not wanting to vandalize the place we left the plywood patches in place and just napped in the sun. There were a couple of Sea Land cargo containers that were open but one smelled of gasoline and the other was full of trash. The view from the place made up for its sorry state and the ski back down to Rosie's proved to be the best skiing of the trip, even though the rope did cause at least one good wipeout.

For day six we planned to get up really early so we could get down the Raven Headwall before the sun made it avalanche-prone. I had the uncanny experience of being woken up from a deep sleep by what was a very clear knocking on the front door at the exact time we wanted to get up. I got up and went downstairs and opened the door expecting to see someone. There was just a ptarmigan on a rock some 30 feet away. I told the others about my experience and asked if they had heard it too. They said they had not. I wrote it off as an odd experience and if nothing else a good omen. I guess you are never alone in the mountains.

The trip up to the col above the Raven Glacier is subject to avalanches on a bad day, but we were fortunate and got to the col just as the sun started to shine on the face below. I was belayed down so I could jump up and down and see if I could get it to slide. A pit and a shear test looked good so we just went straight down without a hint of the bergschrund that is open later in the year. It was a nice ski down to Crow Pass and felt great not to be roped up anymore.

Our last night was spent at the Crow Pass cabin. Though another team had stayed there a week before we still had to dig it out. Only the top two feet of the roof were visible. We once again timed our decent to hit the avalanche areas in the very early morning to avoid soft slopes. The snow and ice was so hard we wore crampons. Deep in the valley by the creek we found avalanches had taken out the tracks of the team in front of us. We all knew someone had died there a few Aprils ago. Following the creek out we found a dead sheep or goat in avalanche debris. Other animals had been eating it.

As we all skied to where the road was maintained I felt sad that the trip was coming to an end. The weeklong adrenalin rush with its divine views was now over and the only thing I could think of was "I can't wait to do it again."
