TRIP REPORTS

Gannett

by Wayne Todd

The headlamp beam finds yet another un-crossable ice chasm blocking our progress. "Don't remember any near this size when we crossed this glacier in the daylight!" we all agree. Kathy leads with the headlamp, then her son Az, and then me, as we slowly zigzag our way up and across the glacier. Occasionally we stop and discuss our progress and direction. We negotiate our way around many crevasses before we sight land.

We began our summit day from Titcomb Lakes at 8 o'clock that morning, thinking that would allow ample time to summit Gannett and return well before dark. Progress was quick up Titcomb valley in the brisk morning air. Even off-trail, at an elevation of 11,000 feet, walking was easy over bare granite or shin-high alpine.

We slowed while ascending the steep slope of loose rocks and scree to Bonney Pass. There we further realized why this is the 'Wind River Range' (WRR) and coupled with the snow, it seemed rather wintry. We had our first look at Gannett Peak from there, a snow and glacier strewn rock massif, still two glaciers away. We crossed the benign-looking (in daylight anyway) Dinwoody glacier after descending from the pass. With a safe route obvious in the daylight, and the ample footing provided by the pitted fall glacier ice, we didn't rope-up. The still-present wind kept us from just lazing and lapping up the view; glacier surrounded by sharp spires and gendarmes on this glorious blue-sky day.

Just before exiting the glacier, we cross below 'twelve training climbers'...a NOLS class perhaps. We speed on up the lower flanks of the south-east ridge until it necks to a gendarme. I venture out onto the Gooseneck glacier searching for route options slightly ahead of the others, knowing that having the route decided will simplify our climb. The 'standard route' usually leads up a snow slope to the left of the steep south-east face, but this late in the year, the route is broken ice over steep rock. The only plausible route I see is a 50' ice climb above a bergschrund. It is agreed so I cautiously span the shrund and lead up the ice with one axe, one light weight axe, and flexible boots and crampons. Fortunately we all have one screw for crevasse rescue that I gladly place here. Once above this section, the second climber ascends quickly on belay. Getting the third person up requires an hour though, from difficulty of lowering ice axes to them, to rope issues and due to hesitation.

Happily reunited back on the ridge above the gendarme, we hasten along noting that the day has progressed rapidly. The views open up to many steep granite peaks, pocket glaciers, and slender valley lakes that the WRR is so renowned.

We summit just before sunset from the walkable south ridge that has sheer faces to the left and steep faces to the right. The unhindered views of peaks, glaciers, lakes, and our route bathed in evening light is gorgeous but worrisome as we didn't plan for night travel and only Az has a headlamp. We have been nine hours getting here. After a quick look-see all around, snacks and photos, and signing in the large metal milk container, we scamper down the ridge, with most of our route already cast in shadow. After efficient rappels, we scurry further down the ridge wanting to find our glacier crossing spot in the quickly waning light.

By the time we crampon-up, it is DARK (unless you count starlight). A major blessing is that despite the cold of the night, it is calm and the weather is excellent. The stars are of no use for navigation, but they do supply solice that night.

The first half of the glacier crossing is smooth, and somewhat familiar, so we make good time. Then we make a slight route adjustment and suddenly the glacier has transformed into the 'gauntlet'. Two hours after zigzagging around seemingly endless gaping crevasses, we make it to terra firma once again below Bonney pass.

Fatigued mentally from the glacier crossing, and physically from the arduous day, we decide to wait until light to continue. After only half an hour though everyone is cold. While unscrewing the headlamp for adjustment, it gets dropped in pieces between boulders. Darkness and cold! Using the auto-focus on my camera which supplies brief bursts of light, we manage to find the pieces in the snow. We have light again.

We ascend to the definitive landmark of Bonney Pass, thinking the worst travel is behind us. However, the 2,500' steep descent over loose rocks and scree in the dark cause many slips, trips and falls, far exceeding the frustration of the glacier crossing. The bouncing and now intermittent light from the headlamp is not much use. The slope never seems to end, and I mutter as such, but once it finally levels, we can relax for the home stretch. Amazingly no one is injured. Early-on in the descent we could see lights bobbing forward from the lake. 'Rescuers', Kathy and I thought in our mottled minds.

We drink gratefully and contentedly from a stream and then plod on. Halfway to the lakes we encounter the headlamp wearers, climbers getting a 3AM start. HmMMM, how had we not known about such an early start time?

As we lumber along upper Titcomb lake, the moon crests the west ridge in the still night, glowing our route and casting long shadows from the scattered boulders across the flat rock and ground.

Wearily, we make camp at 5AM, 21 hours after starting, a new record for all of us.

{<We didn't notice the quiet skies the next day, nor on our exodus day until we made the parking lot and learned of the World Trade Center tragedy of the previous day>}

Eklutna Traverse

by Stu Grenier

Seven of us, Tom Dolan, Eryn Boone, Chism Henery, John Beebee, Adrian Beebee, Eric Teela and myself completed the traverse from Eklutna to Girdwood by way of the Raven Cole and Crow Pass. We skid across Eklutna lake and then walked to the Serenity Falls Hut. We had our gear motored in by the local kids who live at the trailhead. . This was a good thing because the lake ice was pretty thin at the far end of the lake.

Day two we made it to Pitchler's after exploring a few new routes through the usual cravasse fields. We used crampons much farther up than usual due to the low snow winter we had this year.

The next morning at Pitchlers we spent about five hours fixing the roof and Eric built a new bench. After the hut repairs were completed Tom Dolan led a team up towards the ridge above Pitclers but truned around due to a warm snow pack.

After a second night at Pitchlers we had a very comfortable crossing to Hans'. It was overcast so the sun didn't bake us and we had a breeze to keep us cool. The snow was right for the crossing.

At White out pass we met a team going the other way with Nancy Pfifer on it. They told us about the gas situation at the other huts.

Our second day at Hans' was spent fixing the roof in an on and off whiteout. It took about four hours. Tom Dolan climbed Hut Peak between whiteouts. Also at Hans' I noticed an Alaska USA check nailed to the ceiling. It was from a guy named Fred and was for 1,000,000 dollars. It was made out to the MCA. We were elated. I still have the check and will give it to the treasurer next time I see him.

The route from Hans' to Rosie's is the most dangerous for crevasse falls judging form the log books. John agreed to lead a new route for us down skier's left to avoid crevasses. Last year we saw tracks that took this route and they didn't seem to have a problem. The new route was not very good probably because we didn't get high enough on the face to escape the crevasses. John soon found himself up to his waist in a crevasse and took about five minutes to get himself out. Within ten minutes of that crevasse he hit the mother of all crevasses and dropped 20 ft in while taking out about 8 ft of cornice on either side. It took about an hour and a half to get John out. Digging out the cornice so he could pruisics out was the problem. We had to send a foot loop down and use half a belgerie. After he got out it took another 30 minutes to get his pack, which was tied to the rope.

After two crevasse falls in a row I siad to everyone that we need two people to lead or I think we should turn around and head back to Eklutna. After seeing what happened to John you could see why folks were in the mood to follow and not lead. Tom Dolan volunteered and then he recruited me as the second leader. We continued on.

Moving farther up on to the face to escape crevasses we moved down the glacier. The snow seemed very stable this year. We finally decided to drop down to the glacier and regroup at the conspicuous rock pile that marks the start of the moraine. At this point it was clear that Chism was having binding problems. His lether boots seemed to be too soft for his Silverretta bindings. We managed to get cell phone service to let folks know we would be late. This, and a lack of skiing ability, slowed our progress to a crawl. It was 11 at night when we reached the bottom to the steep part . There was a near full moon and a comfortable wind blowing form the west. The stars were out. In one of the most beautiful moon light skis of the year we crossed the Eagle Glacier and climbed up to Rosie's. We arrived after midnight in good spirits. Adrian even wrote a poem that is in the log book at Rosie's.

The next day was too windy and a whiteout so we just hung out. We did manage to measure the boards that the rocks are on that hold the hut in place. 3 boards on the Eagle glacier side need to be replaced. We also discovered that Rosie's is the only hut with a barrel still outside the door. We left notes in all the huts that you are to carry your own human waste bags out. We recommend that people take two trash compac-tor bags for this. We also found that some waste bags were faulty so use with extreme caution. We took care of other people's bags.

After two night s at Rosie's we went over Raven Pass and out Crow Pass. As we were going down the Raven Col we finally heard the geese. This was my fourth April Eklutna Traverse in a row and I always look forward to hearing and seeing the geese return.

Next year we hope to do the Milk Glacier route.

ADZE

In Search Of..

Hi everybody, I have a unique opportunity to get out in the Mountains from May 22 to May 30 since my wife & son will be visiting her folks in Minnesota. I'd like to join a trip that's looking for a good pack mule so any leads anyone could pass my way would be greatly appreciated. I'd also be interested in spending several days in either the East Fork Eklutna or Upper Eagle River drainage, climbing some of the larger peaks (glacier travel is an option). If you would, or know someone who would, like to join me don't hesitate to email or give me a shout at the numbers below.

Thanks,
Courtney Jines
